corrections bill, work. The Work Ethic Camp is working, and I encourage anyone who has not been out there to look at it. As I said earlier, it's attracting national attention now because of its success rate, and comments from the offenders that are actually sentenced to McCook stating how good a job they do with them. There are some other facts here. They have over a third of their offenders that were admitted out there have obtained their GEDs. Some of them go on to college. There's a junior community college, of course, that contracts with Metropolitan Community College out of Omaha to provide their education, that contract. But they attend classes, college classes, and so on. A good number of these offenders have become contributors to our local society there after they are out. And, yes, then after they are out, they're on supervised intensive...supervised probation. I think one of the young people who spoke to a group of senators last year said she kind of got attached to that leg bracelet she wore and it's just kind of a part of her now. But, so I want to clear up the misconception that these people are eligible, to begin with, for ISP. They're not. That's not an option. It's Work Ethic Camp or go behind the walls at the NSP or LCC, something like that, that's much more expensive.

SENATOR HARTNETT: One minute.

SENATOR BAKER: They don't get the personal attention. They're not addressing the substance abuse issues as dramatically as they are at McCook, and so on, and it's just simply a win-win situation. If we did anything, I'd suggest what Senator Pedersen is looking at, too. This I consider community corrections at its best. They're out there in the public, working with people. I'd prefer to have more facilities. Now that it's over capacity, we can demonstrate a need. We could expand it. And that particular facility is engineered to expand quite easily. Can add wings to the facilities that are out there, and probably be very efficient doing it as far as staffing. So rather than say we don't need to send the people, I'm suggesting we need to expand the camp. It's over capacity, it's working, and I encourage anyone who hasn't been out there. I'll buy you lunch, breakfast, whatever. I'll put you up out there. There's a great golf course out there. If you haven't been out there, come out and we will show you how well this
